In its history of over 2,500 years, Xinjiang has been known by numerous names. Its current name was given by the Qing rulers in the 1800s. Xinjiang is the largest division in China. It is also one of five autonomous regions, meaning that the Chinese government largely leaves Xinjiang to govern itself. With more than 1.6 million square kilometers of land, Xinjiang makes up over seventeen percent of China. While it covers a large area, the same can't be said for the population. Though Xinjiang is almost fifty times the size of Taiwan, it has two million fewer people. Some of these people make their living raising goats and sheep, and others work in the energy industry. The region produces the most natural gas in the country.
